Des- in obs. words: see Dec., Desc., Dess., Dis.

Des. prefix. Regular Romanic form of L. dis., in OIt., Sp., Pg., Pr., OFr.; in mod.Fr. retained (as dés.) before a vowel or silent h (déshabillé), otherwise reduced to dé- (OF. descharge, mod. décharge). wise reduced to de- (OF, descharge, mod, decharge). In some cases apparently representing a late L. de-ex-, for L. ex-. Partly from the frequent substitution of dis-, des-, for L. dē- in late L. and Romanic (see DE-prefix 6), partly through the phonetic reduction of des- to dé- in later French, the two prefixes have in that language largely fallen together under the mod. F. dé-. Early OF, words passed into English with the prefix in the form des- (descharge, ME. descharge); here it was sometimes, in conformity descharge); here it was sometimes, in conformity with later OF. pronunciation, reduced to de- (OF. the s was retained, and the prefix at length changed back to the L. type dis- (discharge, dismembre, also spelt dys-) as was also done to some extent in French itself (descorde, now discorde).

In English, therefore, des- is merely the earlier form of Dis- in words from OF, e.g. desarm, des-blame, descharge, desclaundre, descolour, desdain, desembogue, desere (=desheir), deserite (disherit), desgyse, deshonour, desinteressed, desjoyne, desjune, desgree, deshonour, desinteressed, desjoyne, desjune, desgyse, desinoour, desinteressed, desgoyne, desgine, desmail, desmay, desmesure, desperden, desperder, desperage, desperple, despend, despense, despeople, desplay, desport, despree (=disprove), despute, desray, destempre, desturb, destribute, etc. All these have a later form in Dis-, under which they are treated in this Dictionary. Only a few words became obsolete before dis-forms appeared. The prefix is exceptionally retained in descent and it prefix is exceptionally retained in descant, and it is occasionally found for DE- before a vowel, in chemical terms from modern French, as desoxalic, desoxybenzoin, † desoxydate. In despatch, modern desoxybenzoin, † desoxydate. In despatch, modern var. of Dispatch, the spelling des- is not historical, but originated in an 18th c. etymological error. There are many words beginning with des- in which the s belongs to the root-word, and the prefix is de-, as descry, describe, descend, deserve, despair, despite, despoil, destroy. From confusion of these with words in which des- is the prefix, they also were in late ME. often spelt with dis- (discry, discribe, etc.). And, on the other hand, words in dis- followed by s- were sometimes confused with words in dis- prefix, and so also written des- (destinct, destress, etc.). Both these errors have been corrected in the later orthography. † Desacrate. v. Obs. rare - o. [f. L. desacrăt-

a different force: see DISTEND.)

The earliest application of the word in French was to the destente of the arbalest or cross-bow, whereby the strained string was released and the bolt discharged; hence it was transferred to the analogous part in fire-arms. In English, the word seems to have been viewed as connected with L. dētinēre, dētent, and so with detain, detention, and to have been modified in menning accordingly. The fact that the same part which allows of the escape of that which is detained or held tense, is also often the means of detention, favoured this misconception of the word.

Deuce 2 (diūs). colloq. or slang. Also 7 dewce, 7-8 deuse, 7-9 duce, 8 dewse, 9 dial. doose. [Prob. from LG. in 17th c.: cf. Ger. daus, LG. duus, used in precisely the same way, in the exclamatory der daus! was der daus . . .! LG. de duus! wat der dans! was der dans...! LG. de duns! wat de duns!

The derivation of German dans is disputed; but there is reason to think that it is the same word as das dans = the Druce! at dice (where 'two' is the lowest and most unlucky throw), the gender being changed when the gambler's exclamation of vexation 'the deuce!' was metamorphosed into a personal expletive. A parallel development is known in Danish where the plural sh. pobker 'pocks, pox', has come to be felt as a singular, and to be taken for 'the devil', from its use in imprecations such as Gid pobker havde det! Would that a pox had that l, Pobker staa i det! A pox on that! Hrad pobker er det! What the pox (devil) is that? (See Pox.) (On other conjectural identifications see Rev. A. L. Mayhew in Academy 30 Jan. 1802, p. 111.)]

a. Bad luck, plague, mischief; in imprecations and exclamations, as a deuce on him! a deuce of his cane! b. The personification or spirit of mis-his cane! b. The personification or spirit of mischief, the devil. Originally, in exclamatory and interjectional phrases; often as a mere expression of impatience or emphasis: as, what the (+ what a) deuce?. so, who, how, where, when the deuce? (the) acuce take it!, the deuce is in it! Later, in other phrases parallel to those under DEVIL: to play the deuce (with), the deuce and all, the deuce to play the deuce (with), the deuce and all, the deuce to pay, a deuce of a mess, etc.

In the quotations under a (to which the earliest instances belong), 'plague' or 'mischief' is evidently the sense; cf. the parallel and earlier 'A mischief (a pox, or a plague) on him!' 'Mischief (or plague) take you!' 'What a mischief (pox, plague)!' This meaning is also possible in those under b1; cf. the parallel 'What the mischief (or the plague)!' But mischief was personified already before 1700, and 'the devil'; that deuce was already taken in this sense in 1708 is evident from Motteux's use of it as=F. diantre, in b2. In the other quotations in the same group, 'deuce' plainly takes the place of 'devil' in well-known phrases; but such clearly personified uses as 'the deuce knows', 'to go to the deuce', appear late.

earller or a more generic appellation of the same alphabet; lit. 'Nāgarī (? town-script) of the gods'. Nāgarī is app. the fem. adj, meaning 'of the city or town, urban, urbane, refined' (sc. lipi writing, script), f. Skr. nagara city. Its application to a particular written character can be traced back to the rith c., when Albirāni mentions an alphabet called Nāgara, and of a derivative from it called Arāhanāgarī, i. e. 'half-Nāgarī'. The actual origin and history of the compound Dēvanāgarī has not been ascertained, any more than that of Nandi-nāgarī, applied to the South-Indian form of the Nāgarī. It has been noted that the terms dēva-lipi 'writing of the gods', and nāga-lipi' writing of the serpents', occur side by side in a list of 64 kinds of writing enumerated in the Buddhistic Lalitavistara of the 7th c.; but whether these terms have any connexion with dēva-nāgarī is unknown. The 18th c. European scholars who adopted the word, have variant forms from Bengātī or other Indian vernaculars.]

[Here two original OF. and ME. words devis and devise have run together. actual form device represents phonetically ME. devīs, devīs, a. OF. devīs masc., 'division, partition, separation, difference, disposition, wish, desire, will' (Godefroy); 'speech, talke, discourse, a conference, or communication; deuising, conferring, or talking together; also, a deuice, invention; position or appointment of (Cotgr.); in mod.F. action of discoursing, conversation, talk, specification (of work to be done). But the form devise (when not a mere variant spelling of device: see below) represents OF. devise fem. 'division, separation, difference, heraldic device, will, testament, plan, design, wish, desire, liking, opinion, conversation, conference, manner, quality, kind' (Godefroy); 'a deuice, posie, embleme, conceit, coat or cognizance borne; an inuention; a diuision; bound, meere, or marke diuiding land' (Cotgr.); in mod.F. 'action of dividing, that which divides or distinguishes, the motto of a shield, seal, etc., an adage'. The two French words correspond to Pr. devis, devisa, It. diviso, divisa, Romanic derivs. of dīvīs- ppl. stem of dīvīdėre to divide: see DEVISE v.

DEVISE v.

The older word in ME. appears to have been devis, devys, but devise also appears from Caxton ouward, and prob earlier, at least in the phrase, to devise = F. à devise (sense 12). It is however very difficult to distinguish the two words, since devise, devyse occurs not only as the proper spelling of the repr. of OF. devise, but also, in northern and late ME., and in the 16th c., as a frequent spelling of ME. devis, mod. device. In rimes it is generally possible to separate devise = devis, device, from devise proper, but in other positions it is often impossible; nor does the sense give much help, because in OF. devis and devise partly coincided in meaning, while the English distinctions do not always agree with the French. In later times device gradually became the accepted form in all senses, except in that of 'testamentary bequest', which still remains Devise, q. v. There is also some reason to think that in the 17th c. devises (-aixès) was, in the south of England, used in the plural, when device (-ais) was written or at least pronounced in the singular: cf. house sing., houses (-zèz) pl. The sense-development had to a great extent taken place before the words were adopted in English, so that here the historical and logical orders do not agree.]

[a. OF. devise, devis (in same sense):—Romanic devīso, devīsa, for L. dīvīsus, and (late) dīvīsa, from ppl. stem of dīvidēre to divide, distribute, apportion, also, in med.L., = disponere lestamento, apportion, also, in med.L., = disponere lestamento, to dispose by will. In med.L., dīvīssa was in common use = dīvīsio, originally 'division of goods by testament', 'whence also the testament itself is called dīvīsa [and dīvīsio]' (Du Cange). The same word as Device sb., and formerly also sometimes spelt device; the eventual victory of the form devise may be partly due to the influence of the med.L. dīvīsa in wills, but is prob. more owing to the influence of the verb, and the close association of the sb. with it in this special sense.]

The act of devising, apportioning, or assigning, by will; a testamentary disposition of real property; the clause in a will conveying this.

'A gift by will of freehold land, or of such rights arising out of or connected with land as are by English law classed with it as real property, is called a devise. A gift by will of personal property is called a bequest. (Sir F. Pollock, Land Laws (1887) v. 126) But this distinction is modern: cf. quot. 1641, and Devise. v. 4.

and above the Silurian formations; hence, of or pertaining to this formation and the geological period during which it was deposited.

The name was given in reference to the great development of these rocks as a marine fermation in Devonshite. The rocks called 'Old Red Sandstone' in Scotland, West of England, and South Wales, are held to be lacustrine deposits of contemporary age, and included in the Devonian System; and the term is applied all over the world to a system of rocks having the same stratigraphical position, and containing organic remains similar to those of the Devonshire strata.

The order of development of the senses in L. was (r) the action of devoting or consecrating (to good or evil) by vow, (2) the condition of being devoted (to something good), devotedness, loyalty, fealty, allegiance, (3) (in Christian use) devotion to God and his service, piety, religious zeal. Only the Christian use passed from ecclesiastical L. into the Romanic langs. in the Middle Ages, and appears (with various extensions) in ME. from OF. After the Renascence, the etymological sense 'action of devoting' appeared in It., Fr., and Eng., at first only in reference to religious matters; in the 16th c. the word was extended to secular persons and things; this is specially noticed as a novelty in French in 1578 by H. Estienne (see Hatz. Darm.). As all the senses are now in Eng., a logical arrangement without regard to history would follow the order, 8 (including 4); 5 (with 6); 1 (with 2, 3); 7.1

In earlier spelling by Europeans these sounds were commonly represented by simple d, and in the general rectification of this to dh, the latter has been erroneously extended to several words having simple \( \mathbf{z} \) da dental or \( \mathbf{z} \) da lingual, or to words not really Indian, apparently under the notion that an oriental appearance is given to a word by spelling it with dh. In OF. and ME. often varying with de-whence defer, demission sh.², devise, from L. differre, dimissio, divisa. For its force in composition, see DIS-: it is not, like the latter, a living prefix. The historical pronunciation in an unstressed syllable is (di-); cf. divide, diversion, ning prenx. The instorical productation in an instressed syllable is (di-); cf. divide, diversion, diminish; but in cases where there is a parallel word in de-, as delate, dilate, it is usually pronounced (dai-) for the sake of distinction, and the present tendency is to extend (dai-) to other words, as digest, dilute, diluvium, diradiation, direct, diverge, diverse, divest. This seems due partly to analysis of the compound, partly to the influence of stressed forms as di gest sh divers, in which the i is long and diphthongal.

Di- (dei, di), pref. 2, repr. Gr. δι- for δίs twice, as in δίγαμος twice married, δίγλωττος double-tongued, bilingual, δίδραχμος worth two drachmas, δίπτυχος double-folded. Hence, L. Entering into numerous Eng. words, mostly technical, as dichromic, dicotyledon, diganma, digamy, diglot, digraph, dilemma, diphthong, diptych, distich, disyllable; also in the nomenclature of Natural History as Diadelphia, Di nomenciature of Natural History as Diacetyma, Diandria, Didelphia, Diptera: which see in their alphabetical places. So in Crystallography, as in di-tetrahedron a crystal having twice four sides or planes; so di-hexahedron, etc.

2. As a living prefix, used in Chemistry, with the names of compounds and derivatives, in the general sense 'twice, double', but with various special applications.

a. With the names of classes of compounds, as bromide, oxide, sulphide, cyanide, acetate, chlorate, nitrate, sulphiae, amide, amine, etc., expressing the presence of two atoms or combining equivalents of the element or radical, as carbon dioxide valents of the element or radical, as carbon dioxide CO<sub>3</sub>, manganese dichloride Mn Cl<sub>2</sub>.

In the earlier part of the 19th c. the use was different; the Latin prefix bis was then used, where dis is now, to express two proportions of the chlorous constituent, as in bischloride of mercury = corrosive sublimate; while the Greek diswassused to express two proportions of the basic constituent; thus calomel, when supposed to contain two of mercury to one of chlorine, was called a dischloride.

b. With the names of specific compound it is a constituent of the contain two of the cont

b. With the names of specific compounds (chiefly organic), indicating a body having twice the formula of a given compound; used chiefly with the names of hypothetical radicals, to indicate the free manies of hypothetical radicals, to indicate the free state of these (supposed to be that of a double molecule), as in di-allyt, dibenzyl, dicyanogen.

In diphenol, the use is less exact, since this substance has not exactly the constitution of two molecules of phenol.

C. With the name (or combining form of the name) of an element or radical, expressing the presence of two atoms or molecules of that body, as in di-hydr(o)-, di-oxy-, di-carbon-, di-earb, o)-, di-nitr(o)-, di-az(o)-, di-chlor(o)-, di-brom(o)-, di-ind(o)-, di-sulph(o)-, di-phosph(o)-, di-bro(o)-, di-arsen(o)-, di-ammoni-o)-, di-amm(o)-, di-amid(o)-, di-cyan(o)-, di-methyl-, di-ethyl-, di-propyl-, di-amyl-, di-diyl-. Used especially in organic chemistry, to indicate that two atoms or molecules of the body take the place of two atoms of hydrogen as presence of two atoms or molecules of that body, body take the place of two atoms of hydrogen, as in dibromomethane, dichlorobenzene.

d. These formations (c) are sometimes used attributively or adjectively as separate words, as di-azo compounds, di-carbon series, di-phenyl group. So with other adjectives, as diacid, dihydric, diphenic.

e. On the preceding classes of words derivatives are formed, as diacotice, diacotype, dichromated.

Di-, pref.3, the form of Dia- used before a vowel, as in di-acoustic, di-aresis, di-esis, di-ocese, di-optric, di-orama.

Dia-, pref.1, before a vowel di-, repr. Gr. δια-, δι-, the prep. διά through, during, across, by. [orig. *δ F iya, from root of *δ F o, δύο two, and so related to δίς, *δ F is twice (DI-2) and L. dis- a-two, asunder (Dis-, Di-1).] Much used in Greek in composition, in the senses 'through, thorough, thoroughly, apart', as in διάδρομος running through, διάλεκτος apart, as in οιαορομος running through, οιαλεκτος discourse, διάμετρος measure through or crosswise, diameter, διατριβή wearing through or away, pastime, δίοπτρον a thing for looking through, a spyglass. Hence in English, in a few old words through Latin and French, or Latin only, and in many modern scientific and technical words formed directly from Greek or on Greek analogies.

directly from Greek, or on Greek analogies. Dia-, pref.<sup>2</sup>, in medical terms. In Greek such phrases as διὰ καρύων, διὰ κωδειῶν, διὰ μίσυος, διὰ μύρων, διά τριών πεπερέων, διά τεσσάρων, διά πέντε, meaning 'made or consisting of nuts, of poppyheads, of vitriol, of mulberries, of three peppers, of four or of five (ingredients)', etc., were applied to medicaments of which these ingredients were the chief constituents, the full form implied being τδ διὰ τριῶν πεπερίων φόρμακον medicament made up of three peppers, etc. By the Latin physicians these phrases were treated as words, thus diachylon, diacissōn, diacōtīōn, diaglauciōn, diagrydiōn, dialibanōn, diametilōtōn, diametilōn, diamisyos, diamoron, diapente, diatessaron; and their number was increased by many later formations of the same kind. Their grammatical character tended to be forgotten, final -on (Gr. -ov) being taken for -on (Gr. -or), and then latinized as -um, e.g. diachi/lum, dia-glaucium, dialibanum, dihæmatum (δι' αἰμάτων); or a nominative was otherwise formed, as diapentes. The New Sydenham Society's Lexicon gives about eighty of these in mediæval and early modern Latin.

Several of these are given in French form by Cotgrave; many were formerly in English use, either in their mediaval-Latin form or partly anglicized. Phillips 1678-1706 has 'Dia, a Greek Preposition . set before the names of many medicinal composition. sitions, to which that of the principal Ingredient is usually joined, by Physicians and Apothecaries, as Diaprunum, Diascordium, Diascona, etc.' Only a few, e.g. Diachtyleus, survive in modern use: see also, in their alphabetical places, Diacatho-Licon, Diacodium, Diagnydium, Diamber, Dia-Moron, Diafalma, Diaprune, Diascord, Dia-SENNA, DIATESSARON. Among others, are the obsolete Diaca rthami (-amy) [F. diacartami Cotgr.], a preparation of earthamus or bastard saffron; Dia-

1. The art of critical examination into the truth of an opinion; the investigation of truth by discussion: in earlier English use, a synonym of Locic as applied to formal rhetorical reasoning; logical as applied to formal rhetorical reasoning; logical argumentation or disputation.

Originally, the art of reasoning or disputation by question and answer, 'invented', according to Aristotle, by Zeno of Elea, and scientifically developed by Plato, by whom the term διαλεκτική was used in two senses, (a) the art of definition or discrimination of 'ideas', (b) the science which views the inter-relation of the ideas in the light of a single principle 'the good'; corresponding broadly to logic and metaphysic. By Aristotle the term was confined to the method of probable reasoning, as opposed to the demonstrative method of science. With the Stoics, rhetoric and dialectic formed the two branches of λογως, logic, in their application of the term; and down through the Middle Ages dialectica was the regular name of what is now called 'logic', in which sense accordingly dialectic and dialectics were first used in English.

2. In modern Philosophy: Specifically applied by Kant to the criticism which shows the mutually contradictory character of the principles of science, when they are employed to determine objects beyond the limits of experience (i.e. the soul, the world, God); by Hegel (who denies that such contradictions are ultimately irreconcilable) the term is applied (a.) to the process of thought by which such contradictions are seen to merge themselves in a higher truth that comprehends them; and (b.) to the world-process, which, being in his view but the thought-process on its objective side, develops similarly by a continuous unification of opposites.

whence Pt. aaiman, asiman, ayman, OPI. aaiman, app. under the influence of the numerous technical words beginning with the prefix D1λ-, Gr. δια-.

The differentiation of form in late L. was probably connected with the double signification acquired by adamas of 'diamond' and 'loadstone' (see Adamant); for, in all the languages, diamant with its cognates was at length restricted to the gem, as aimant was in F. to the loadstone. In English the dyamannd and adamannd are distinguished from and opposed to each other ε 1400 in Maundevile, ed. 1839, xiv. r61, ed. Roxb. Soc. xvii. 80; but adamant long retained the double sense of late L. adamas: thus Sherwood, r623, has 'An Adamant stone, (F.) aimant, diamant, catamite, pierre marinière.' See Adamant.

The a of the middle syllable has tended to disappear since the r6th c., as shown by the spelling dêmond, dimond. Sheridan and other early orthoepists recognize the dissyllable pronunciation, but most recent authorities reckon three syllables. In Shakspere the word is more frequently a trisyllable; but it is very generally dissyllable in Pope, Thomson, Vonng, Cowper, Keats, and Tennyson.]

Diaper (doirāpai), sb. Forms: 4-6 diapre, dyapre, 5 dyapere, 6 dyoper, dieper, dyeper, 6-7 dyaper, (7 dipar, dibar), 6-diaper. [ME. a. OF. dyapre, diapre, orig. diaspre (Godef.), Pr. diaspre, diaspe, in med.L. diasprus adj., diaspra, diaspra, diaspra (1023), sb. (Dn Cange); in Byzantine Gr. δίασπροs adj., f. δια- (DiA-1) + άσπροs white.

Early French references mention diaspre 'que fit fais en Costantinoble and 'dyaspre d'Antioch', and associate it with other fabrics of Byzantine or Levantine origin. Thus, the Koman de la Rose 1, 2103 (Meon III. 294) has 'Cendaux, molequins arrabis, Indes, vermaux, jaunes et bis. Samis, diapres, camelos'. The word occurs in mediaval Greek, e 959, in Constantine Porphyrogenitus De Ceremoniis Aulæ Byzant. (Bonn 1829-40, p. 528) where the ipárous or robe used in the investment of a Rector is described as δίαπρον. On the analogy of διάλευκο, δίασπρον may mean 'white at intervals, white interspersed with other colour'; though the sense might also be 'thoroughly' or 'pure white.' In OF., diaspre 'iasper' appears to be unconnected with F. and Prov. diaspre 'diaper'. Dn Cange has mixed up the two. Diathermancy (dəiāþō mansi). Physics. [ad. F. diathermansie, formed by Melloni, 1833, from Gr. διά through + θέρμανσι heating, f. θερμαίνειν to heat. The French ending follows the analogy of paralysie for Gr. παράλυσις. The Eng. ending faralysie for Gr. παράλυσις. The Eng. ending simulates the -ncy of transparency, buoyancy. Melloni's original term was diathermanettl, from diathermane adj. (Ann. Chim. et Phys. 1833, L111. 59, LV. 396, Phil. Mag. 1835 VII. 476); the latter was, according to him, 'f. δάα+θεριαίνω, in imitation of diaphane, f. δία+φαίνω to show.' But the analogy was not exact: diaphane is not derived from δία and φαίνω, only from the same root; and in θεριαίνω, -αίνω does not helong to the root, but is a verhal suffix, the stem being θερια. Diathermane was first rendered in Eng. diathermal, but after 1837 generally diathermaneus. To express the notion of 'coloration on teinte calorifique', Melloni introduced diathermansie, f. Gr. δία +θέριωσνει heating (Ann. Chim. et Phys. LV. 377). But the distinction between diathermansite and diathermansie appears not to have been generally appreciated; in the Eng.

translation of Melloni's paper in Taylor's Scientific Memoirs, 1837. I. 72, diathermancy is used for both F. words, and English writers generally have used it in the sense of Melloni's diathermanétié. For these and other reasons, Melloni afterwards (Comptes Rendus, 1841, XIII. 815) abandoned his original terms, and gave a new nomenclature: viz. diathermique adj., instead of diathermane; diathermasie (ad. Gr. basepancia) in place of diathermanetit; and thermochrose for diathermansie' colouring or tint of heat', with corresponding adj. thermochrotyne. But, though some English writers have thence used diathermic and diathermacy, most have continued to employ diathermanous and diathermancy, the latter in the sense not of Melloni's diathermansie, but of his diathermanetité or diathermasie.] † 1. orig. The word has been used from ancient times in the reckoning of skins or hides; a letter of the Roman Emperor Valerian (A.D. 253-260) preserved by Trebellius Pollio, directs Zozimion, procurator of Syria, to furnish to Claudius, among other supplies, 'pellium tentoriarum decurias trightar', i. e. 30 dickers of skins for tents. Kluge points out that the early adoption of the Latin word by the Germans is explained by the tribute of skins which the latter had to pay to the Romans Tacitus Ann. iv. 72, as well as by the fact that skins formed a leading item in the frontier trade between the Romans and the northern barbarians, as they have in the traffic between white men and the Indians in North America in modern times (see Dickea v.).]

Dicker, v. U.S. [?f. Dicker 5b.]

Quotation 1848 refers to the barter traffic on the Indian frontier in N. America. As skins have always formed a chief item in that trade, it has been suggested with much probability that the verb arose, in the sense 'to deal by the dicker, to deal in skins', among the traders with the Indians, and has thence extended in U. S. to trade by barter generally. If this be the fact, it is interesting that a word which passed from Latin into Germanic in special connexion with dealing in skins, and which has ever since in Europe been associated with this trade 'see Dicker sb.), should, in America, through similar dealings between a civilized and note/villaged race, have received another development of use.] intr. Diddler (di'dlə1). [Of obscure origin. Found first in the name of 'Jeremy Diddler', the chief character in Kenney's farce, 'Raising the Wind', brought out in 1803. The name was of course intended to be contemptuous and ludicrous, and it seems probable that it was formed on Diddler's, or on the first element of the earlier diddle-daddle, diddle-dum (see Diddle-); it is also probable that Jeremy Diddler's characteristic methods of 'raising the wind', by continually borrowing small sums which he does not pay back, and otherwise sponging upon people, gave rise to the current sense of the verb (Diddle 13 sense 2), of which 'diddler' is now naturally viewed as the agent-noun.] the agent-noun.1

pop. L., datum was taken in the sense 'that which pop. L., dalum was taken in the sense 'that which is given or decreed (sc. by lot or fortune)', and was so applied to the dice by which this was determined. Latinized mediaval forms from It. and Fr. were dadus, decius.

In late OF. the form dey occurs in 14th c.; and dez was sometimes used in sing, down to 17th c.; cf. the 14-17th c. Eng. use of dice as sing. The remarkahle point in the history of the Eng. word is the change of de, des, to dy, dys (dyse, dyce, dice), in the ME. period. The oldest Chancer MSS, Harl, Ellesm., Hengwrt, have dees, which also survived as late as 1484 in Caxton, but dys occurs in the other Chancer MSS, and in rime in the Bodleian MS. of Kyng Alisaunder, part of which is in the Auchinleck MS, attributed to the middle of the 14th c. Before 1500, dy, dys seem to have completely passed from the ē into the I class, the fortunes of which they have since shared. As in pence, the plural s retains its original breath sound, probably because these words were not felt as ordinary plurals, but as collective words; cf. the orig. plural trnce, where the collective sense has now passed into a singular. This pronunciation is indicated in later spelling by ce: cf. the unlaut plurals lice, mice, the inflexional forms hence, once, twice, since, and the words ice, nice, advice, defence, in all which ce represents a phonetic and original s. In the newer senses where the plural is not collective, a form (dsiz) of the ordinary type has arisen; cf. the non-collective later plural pennics.]

(db::-*dów, dainn::**dawans). In the other langs, and in Eng. a regular weak verb. No instance of the word is known in OE. literature (its sense being expressed by steorfan, sweltan, or the periphrastic wesan déad, pa. t. was déad: see DEAD 1 d) hence it is generally held to have been early lost in OE. (as in Gothic, and as subsequently in all the continental WGer. langs.), and re-adopted in late OE. or early ME. from Norse; but some think that the facts point rather to the preservation of an OE. diegan, degan, in some dialect; the word appears to have been in general use from the 12th c., even in the s.w. dialects (see Napier in Hist. Holy Rood, E.E.T.S., 1894). The ME. desen, deghen came regularly down to 1500 as deye, which was retained in the North as dey, de, dee (still current from Lancashire to Scotland); but in standard English deghe was in 14th c. (in conformity with the common phonetic history of OE. eh, eah, eoh, the common phonetic history of OE. eh, cah, coh, as in dye, eye, fly, high, lie, nigh, thigh, etc.) narrowed to dize, dighe, whence the later dye, die.

The oldest text of Cursor M. (Cotton) has only dey; in the later texts this is frequently altered to dighe, dye, when not in rime, in the late Trinity MS. sometimes even in rime, with change of text. Chaucer used both dey and dye, the C. T. (Ellesm. MS.) contains in the rimes 22 examples of deye and 50 of dye. Both forms are also used in the Wyelfite version, and both occur in Caxton's works.

The stem dan-appears also in Gothic in the ppl. a. dan's, OE. died (-dand-os) Box, and the sb. dan'ns, OE. died (-dand-os) Box, and the sb. dan'ns, OE. dead (-dand-os) Lexan (-afdavidan), pa. pple. a fidand-(-afdavidan), undivanel, etc. is uncertain.) The simple verb has shown a notable tendency to die out, and leave its place to be taken by derivatives: thus in Gothic dan'nan to die.]

diet.

Med.L. diēta had the various senses 'day's journey', 'day's work', 'day's wage', 'space of a day', as well as that of 'assembly, meeting of conncillors, diet of the empire'. The same senses, more or less, are (or have been) expressed by Ger. tag, and F. journée day. Diêta has therefore been viewed as a simple derivative of L. dies day, distinct from diæta, Gr δίαιτα, DIET sb. ¹. But it seems more likely that one or other of the senses developed from diæta was associated with dies, and led to the application of the word to other uses arising directly from dies. One of the senses given by Du Cange is 'the ordinary course of the church': this seems naturally transferred from δίαιτα, diæta, in the sense 'ordinary or prescribed course of life', which might be understood to mean 'daily office', and so lead to the use of diēta for other daily courses, duties, or occasions.]

Dif-, prefix of L. origin, being the assimilated form of dis- before f, as in dif-ferre, dif-fūsio. In Romanic it became def-, which in OF. was subsequently reduced to de-; this occasionally appears in Eng., as defer from L. differre, OF. defferer, mod. F. defferer, defy from L. type diffidare, It. diffidare, disfidare, OF. desf-, deff-, deficr, mod. F. deffer. Usually, however, the Latin form of the prefix is used in Eng.; ef. differ, difficult, diffidence, diffuse. For its force, see Dis-; it is not, like the latter. a living suffix.

Diffate, -famation, etc., generally obsolete, but still occasionally used.

1727-51 Chambers Cycl. s. v., Diffarreation was properly the dissolving of marriages contracted by confarreation, which were those of the pontifices. Festus says it was performed with a wheaten cake.

Differ (di fəi), v. Also 6 dyffer (defer), 6-7 differre. [a. F. différer (in Froissart 14th c.), ad. L. differ-re to carry or bear apart, spread abroad, distract, protract, delay, defer; also intr. to tend apart or diversely in nature or character, to differ. The or diversely in nature or character, to differ. The verb was used with both senses in F. in 14th c., and has continued to be so used till the present day. In English, it was taken first in the transitive sense, with stress differ (cf. confer, refer, prefer), which led at length to the transitive senses being written defer: see Defer v.1; the intrans. use, being closely related in sense to different, difference, apparently followed these words in stressing the first syllable. (Offer, suffer, which have the same stress, have a distinct form in French and Romanic.) And one transitive use, closely associated with the intrans. and with different, difference, has gone with these. In this way L. differre, F. differer, ME. differre, has been split into the two verbs defer to put off, and differ to make or be unlike. The pr. pple. differ-ing occurs in Chaucer's Boethius; but instances of
